days, PDX Coin will be on a fast trajectory to get its coins out to millions of potential contributors quickly.

PDX is developing a new global digital banking and payments platform for the crypto-economy that will offer widespread retail crypto-to-fiat payment capability, worldwide, for both mobile and desktop applications. The platform is also an ideal ramp for metaverse payments, with the UX being developed to better enable transactions in the metaverse.

"We have seen high interest in new payment systems that completely sidestep today's slower legacy card-based payments architecture, so being able to list with a second exchange is ideal and will help us move into high gear," said Shane Rodgers, CEO, PDX Coin. "Metaverse payments is an area where we see a hot and obvious market."

The upcoming PDX high-speed instant payment platform, based on an enhanced blockchain protocol and bank-friendly processing architecture, aims to provide merchants and consumers with a modern alternative to the traditional 70-year-old bank payments system that hits users with high fees, long float times and fraud risk.

The PDX payment app framework will allow most major cryptocurrencies to become instantly liquid and spendable in tens of millions of locations around the world; accelerating the opening of the crypto economy to institutions, merchants, and other ecosystem partners worldwide. PDX is targeting at least 250 million downloads globally by the end of the decade as crypto mass adoption continues to grow.
